SUPPORT THE INDYPENDENT

WE CAN’T DO THIS WITHOUT YOU
FOR MORE ON OUR ANNUAL WINTER FUND DRIVE, SEE PAGES 2, 22–23

LABOR BATTLES
NYC WAREHOUSE WORKERS, BARISTAS, DELIVERISTAS, ADJUNCT PROFESSORS AND MORE ARE FIGHTING FOR DIGNITY AND A BETTER LIFE

P4 • P10–17

DREAMS OF MY RADICAL NUYORICAN MOTHER — P18

THE INDYPENDENT
#276: DEC 2022/JAN 2023
EDITOR’S NOTE

ELON MUSK WILL NEVER OWN THE INDY
BUT READER SUPPORT REMAINS ESSENTIAL TO THE SURVIVAL OF THIS NEWSPAPER

In late October, the world’s richest man, Elon Musk, purchased the world’s “toom square,” for $4.4 billion. Twitter’s total number of users (235 million) is dwarfed by Facebook (1.98 billion) and the company loses money almost every year. Yet, it has an outsized influence on the media and public discourse. So Musk snapped it up.

With his new toy in hand, Musk promptly fired half of Twitter’s 7,500 employees. Content moderation has been largely dismantled. And Twitter is once again awash in neo-Nazis and other far-right trolls and conspiracy theorists who Musk encourages at every turn.

Will the manic maneuverings of Twitter’s new owner cause the company to implode? Will Musk, the son of a South African diamond magnate, whose business empire includes Tesla Motors and Space-X, tumble from the sky like a modern-day Icarus? Signs so far are encouraging. Corporate advertisers are fleeing Twitter. The value of Tesla’s stock has halved this year amid Musk’s dalliance with social media. On December 12, Forbes announced that Musk — whose net worth has declined to a mere $167 billion — had been dethroned as the world’s wealthiest person by French industrialist Bernard Arnault.

This couldn’t be more urgent. Corporate media can’t bring itself to say it. But we live in a moment of rising fascism. Elon Musk’s hostile Twitter takeover is just froth atop the wave. LGBTQ people and their safe spaces are attacked. In anti-abortion laws in the country, abortion clinics are being closed, pregnant people and their helpers surveilled and criminalized across state lines. School boards and libraries are being bullied; teachers risk losing their jobs for conveying an honest version of this country’s history. Local election officials are besieged with death threats. Killer cops are once again beyond reproach. Turns out the same far-right forces that have whined for years about “cancel culture” can’t get enough of it.

The goal of this violent minority is to gradually push all of us who don’t share their vision for society to the margins of public life and to foreclose the possibility of changing an already unacceptable status quo.

The only thing that can cancel The Indy is a lack of funds, which is always a possibility. We almost went under during the pandemic but pulled through thanks to reader support. But scraping by can’t be the norm. This is why we have set our highest-ever goal for our winter fund drive: $50,000. With your backing, we can do even more great work in 2023, without the stress of wondering if our next month will be our last.

If you have given before, we welcome your continued support. If you enjoy reading The Indy but have not given before, this is a great time to strengthen a people’s institution. Whether you can make a holiday gift of $27, $50, $100, $200, $500, $1,000 or more, it all makes a difference.

Our mission is to report on and amplify the voices of progressive and radical social movements here in New York City and beyond, providing incisive coverage you won’t find anywhere else.

Running on a shoestring budget, our small paid staff and dozens of volunteers do the herculean task of bringing you this free newspaper and circulating it across the city each month. We also update the indypendent.org website with breaking news between print editions, host a weekly radio show on WBAI-99.5 FM that airs Tuesdays at 5 p.m., publish a weekly e-newsletter that you can sign up for at bit.ly/3HG0wzQ and share on social media.

Left unasked is why should one person have so much power? What would a civic-minded Internet run as a public utility freed from the whims of billionaires and the relentless logic of capitalist profit-seeking look like? Hopefully, we will find out some day.

In the meantime, we should defend and support the public commons that we still do have, including The Indy.

Here at The Indy, we don’t work for distant corporate shareholders or to get rich. Our mission is to report on and amplify the voices of progressive and radical social movements here in New York City and beyond, providing incisive coverage you won’t find anywhere else.

In the past year we have provided extensive coverage of the upsurge in labor organizing and strikes (with more in this issue!). We have also chronicled the abuses and excesses of Mayor Eric Adams, continued to report on the struggle between NYC’s machine Democrats and progressive and socialist reformers, closely followed tenant movements around the city, including new organizing endeavors among homeless New Yorkers, and covered the loss of the historic queer “People’s Beach” at Jacob Riis Park, just to cite a few highlights from our coverage.

In this huge city, it’s easy for us as individuals or groups to feel isolated. The Indy helps us see our connectedness, see ourselves as something more than the sum of our parts, as a movement of movements.

The Indy’s only goal is to report on and amplify the voices of progressive and radical social movements, to help us see ourselves as more than the sum of our parts, as a movement of movements.

Onward,
John Tarleton
Editor-in-Chief

TO MAKE A HOLIDAY GIFT TO THE INDEPENDENT, GO TO: INDEPENDENT.ORG/DONATE OR VISIT THE QR CODE ABOVE OR SEND A CHECK OR MONEY ORDER TO: THE INDYPENDENT // 388 ATLANTIC AVE., 2ND FL. // BROOKLYN, NY 11217

THE INDYPENDENT, INC.
388 Atlantic Avenue,
2nd Floor
Brooklyn, NY 11217
917-426-4856
www.indypendent.org
Twitter: @TheIndypendent
facebook.com/TheIndypendent

BOARD OF DIRECTORS
Ellen Davidson, Anna Gold, Alina Mogilyskaya, Ann Schneider, John Tarleton

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF
John Tarleton

ASSOCIATE EDITOR
Amba Guerguerian

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
Ellen Davidson, Alina Mogilyskaya, Nicholas Powers, Steven Wishnia

ILLUSTRATION DIRECTOR
Frank Reynoso

DESIGN DIRECTOR
Mikael Tarkela

DESIGNERS
Lea Doran, Anna Gold, Evan Sult

GENERAL INQUIRIES:
contact@indypendent.org

SUBMISSIONS & NEWS TIPS:
submissions@indypendent.org

ADVERTISING & PROMOTION:
ads@indypendent.org

VOLUNTEER CONTRIBUTORS
Linda Martin Alcoff, Dashiell Allen, Eleanor J. Bader, Bennett Baum, Nina Berman, Laura Jane Brett, Sue Brisik, Olga Federova, Renée Felz, Todd Fine, Lynne Foster, Jenna Gaudino, Esteban Guerra, Theodore Hamm, Nancy Hoch, David Hollenbach, Manvi Jalan, Marty Kirchner, Yi Liu, Kenneth Lopez, Derek Ludovici, Ash Marraccio, Gary Martin, Reverend Billy, Dylan Rifle, Sachiya Riddle, Steven Sherman, Julia Thomas, and Tyronne Wallace.

VOLUNTEER DISTRIBUTORS
Eric Anders-Nilsen, Eric Breelsford, Hank Dombrowski, Joseph Epstein, Lew Friedman, Priscilla Grim, Michael Korn, Christine Miller, Saul Nieves, Tom O’Keeffe, Caroline Rath, Norm Scott, Carol Smith, and Amanda Vender.
IN THIS ISSUE

COLLECTIVE ACTION WINS, P4
Part-time faculty at The New School went on strike for 24 days and won important gains.

HOUSE RULES, P6
Hakeem Jeffries’ Wall Street ties have helped fuel his rise to be the top Democrat in the House.

PRICE-GOUGED, P7
Con Ed is seeking another round of double-digit rate hikes.

COLORADO SPRINGS REACTION, P8
“If I’m going to go down, it better be in a place that has love in it,” a cocktail waitress told The Indy.

HOMOPHOBIA, P9
The far right is stoking hatred of the LGBTQ community. Will it work?

HOT OFF THE PRESSES, P10
The Amazon Labor Union’s new newspaper is witty and to-the-point.

WORKER SELF-DEFENSE, P11
The “Delivery Boys” have organized a self-defense network to combat a surge in e-bike thefts.

DOUBLE THE TROUBLE, P12
Baristas at the Starbucks-Amazon Go store at Times Square are taking on two of the largest union busters.

LABOR BRIEFS, P14
Municipal retirees win court battle, NLRB takes action, labor rumblings at Montefiore Hospital, NJ farmworker card check.

AUTOMATE THIS, P15
Artificial intelligence will replace 45 million jobs this decade. Then what?

BOSSES BROUGHT TO HEEL, P17
How airline stewardesses fought sexism and unionized their profession.

DREAMS OF MY NUYORICAN MOTHER, P18
Nicholas Powers looks back on how the 1960s transformed his mother’s life.

WORLD CUP CAPTURE, P20
This year’s World Cup in Qatar is not the first time the event has been co-opted by autocrats.

REVEREND BILLY’S REVELATIONS, P21
Reverend Billy remembers two friends who left inspiring legacies of art and activism.

AN ACT OF CREATION, P22
The left has to fund its own institutions, or they won’t exist.

Join the Democracy Now! Team

We’re hiring a People and Culture Manager and an Associate Digital Editor

Learn more and apply today at DEMOCRACYNOW.ORG

Daily Public TV / Radio / Internet News Hour
Tune in to Democracy Now!'s daily news hour for the latest in-depth interviews, analysis, historical perspectives and substantive debates on the most pressing issues of the day.

#PEACEINUkraine

SIGN + SHARE OUR PETITION TO CONGRESS: demand a cease-fire and a negotiated peace in Ukraine:
bit.ly/UkrainePetitionBFP

Sign up for our newsletter: bit.ly/BFP-Newsletter
Get involved: brooklynpeace.org/volunteer
Become a member: bit.ly/BFPmember
By Indypendent Staff

After striking for nearly a month, part-time faculty at The New School reached a tentative contract agreement with management on Dec. 10. The deal would give the adjunct professors their first pay raise in four years. It would also provide better health-care coverage and pay them for the first time for work done outside the classroom such as advising students.

“This time last year, I was researching the growing labor movement for my master’s thesis at Parsons. Yesterday, my New School faculty colleagues and I became part of labor history,” tweeted Molly Regan, one of the strike leaders.

The union’s bargaining committee unanimously recommended approval of the package. As The Indypendent went to press, union members were reviewing the terms of the settlement before voting on it.

The strike shook The New School, which has long been associated with progressive ideals. It was founded in 1919 by prominent intellectuals including professors who were forced out of Columbia University for opposing U.S. entry into World War I. The New School later became a magnet for Jewish academics fleeing Nazi Germany and has maintained a progressive reputation since.

These days, poorly paid adjuncts make up 87% of the teaching faculty at The New School. When their strike began on Nov. 16, classes ground to a halt. Once underway, the strike brought daily picket lines to the main campus building just southwest of Union Square in Lower Manhattan. The picketing part-time professors found enthusiastic support from New School students who saw the strikers’ cause as their own.

“I would happily give up finishing my MFA if it meant better opportunities for writers to come as a result of this strike,” said Allegra Rosenbaum, a first-year graduate student.

The strikers also received picket-line support from other unions including Amazon Labor Union, Starbucks Workers United and their academic union brethren at NYU and Columbia.

Shortly before the strike ended, the parents of New School students threatened to file a lawsuit against the university while students took over part of the University Center and staged a round-the-clock occupation.

“It was the perfect storm of a lot of factors,” said Lee-Sean Huang, a part-time assistant professor at Parsons School of Design, New School since 2016 and a member of the ACT-UAW 7902 bargaining committee.

For many students, witnessing a strike for the first time was a revelation.

Radha, a third-year student at Lang College of Liberal Arts, echoed an Instagram comment by her mother that “The New School may have unintentionally radicalized and created an entire university’s student body that will always support unions.”

The student occupation of the University Center that began in the final days of the strike continued after classes resumed. The part-time faculty’s strike victory has inspired some students and faculty to call for a thorough restructuring of The New School and how it is run.

On Dec. 12, the One New School Coalition of students and faculty issued a statement of no-confidence in the New School’s top executives and the Board of Trustees and called on them to resign.

“We demand full financial transparency and the activation of a full participatory process for the administration of the school, including the budget,” the group said in a statement it released.

SOLIDARITY FROM STUDENTS, PARENTS AND OTHER UNIONS BOOSTED THE STRIKERS’ CAUSE.
Our basic constitutional rights are in jeopardy. ‘Law and Disorder’ is an excellent magazine-format radio show, hosted by progressive lawyers who analyze the state of civil rights in this post-9/11 period.”

AMY GOODMAN
HO ST, DEMOCRACY NOW!

Co-hosts Heidi Boghosian, Michael Smith, Marjorie Cohn and Jim Lafferty are activist attorneys and writers. Each show features two or three interview segments with brief introductory host exchanges or editorials on current affairs. Each segment ends with a way that listeners can learn more about, or even get involved in, the issue at hand.

Airing on over 140 stations around the nation

lawanddisorder.org

Listen to the show each week and download podcasts at

BELOW14TH ST.
SEWARD PARK LIBRARY
192 East Broadway

BLUESTOCKINGS COOPERATIVE
116 Suffolk St.

LES PEOPLE’S FEDERAL CREDIT UNION
29 Avenue B

THEATER FOR THE NEW CITY
155 First Ave.

MCNALLY-JACKSON BOOKS
52 Prince St.

14TH TO 96TH ST.

EPHRAIM BRANCH LIBRARY
228 E. 23rd St.

MULBERRY BRANCH LIBRARY
10 Jersey St.

4TH ST. FOOD CO-OP
58 E. 4th St.

OTTENDORFER LIBRARY
135 Second Ave.

FILM FORUM
209 W. Houston St.

Hudson Park Library
66 Leroy St.

PACIFIC LIBRARY
25 4th Ave.

DUB PIES
211 Prospect Park West

BEACON’S CLOSET
89 Fifth Ave.

WASHINGTON IRRVING LIBRARY
340 Irving Ave.

CONNECTICUT MUFFIN
429 Myrtle Ave.

WYCKOFF STARR COFFEE SHOP
30 Wyckoff Ave.

BRONX

PARKCHESTER LIBRARY
1485 Parkchester Ave.

MORRIS PARK LIBRARY
958 Morris Park Ave.

ALLERTON LIBRARY
2740 Barnes Ave.

MOTT HAVEN LIBRARY
321 E. 140th St.

HIGH BRIDGE LIBRARY
78 W. 168th St.

NEW SETTLEMENT COMMUNITY CENTER
1501 Jerome Ave.

THE POINT
940 Garrison Ave.

JERSEY CITY

FIVE CORNERS LIBRARY
678 Newark Ave.

Want to help distribute The Indy? Call 917-426-4856 or email contact@indypendent.org.
MEET THE NEW BOSS, SAME AS...

BROOKLYN’S HAKEEM JEFFRIES BECOMES THE HOUSE’S NEW TOP DEM

By Theodore Hamm

Hakeem Jeffries’ ascent to succeed Nancy Pelosi as leader of the House Democrats provoked a wave of media commentary about Brooklyn’s prominence on the national political stage. Jeffries and Senate Majority Leader Chuck Schumer now can share a park bench near Grand Army Plaza and plot strategy.

It is not exactly clear how the masses of Brooklyn or the rest of New York City might benefit from the duo’s influence. But the high-rollers on Wall Street are no doubt thrilled to have two of their closest allies in power.

Jeffries, a former corporate lawyer, has rarely fought for the issues that animate the Democrats’ activist base. Meanwhile, leading Wall Street players stridently oppose single-payer health care, champion their own versions of a Green New Deal, and bear overwhelming responsibility for the student debt crisis.

Even though Democrats are the minority party in the House, progressives want Jeffries to push their issues. “We want to have hearings on Medicare for All [and] free public college,” Bay Area Congressman Ro Khanna recently told Axios.

Jeffries’ money trail nonetheless suggests that Wall Street will continue to have his ear.

First elected to his Central Brooklyn/southwest Queens seat in 2012, Jeffries became the party’s Caucus Chair after the 2018 midterms. Rumors began to swirl that he would succeed Pelosi. After he raised between $1.1 million and $1.74 million in his first four campaigns, Jeffries’ coffers began to fill up for the 2020 cycle.

Although he did not face a serious challenger in either of his last two elections, Jeffries’ filings — as tracked by OpenSecrets.org — show that he hauled in over $4.1 million in 2020 and $5.8 million this year. (His 2022 opponent raised $20,000.) Pelosi averaged $24 million in the last two cycles, suggesting that Jeffries may need to hire more bookkeepers.

In his last two campaigns, Jeffries collected roughly $8.80,000 from Wall Street hedge fund, private equity and real estate interests. These investors often make overlapping investments, as evidenced by Blackstone Group, a private equity firm that is also a giant landlord. Blackstone deposited nearly $33,000 in Jeffries’ 2022 campaign coffers.

Jeffries’ intake from Wall Street currently pales in comparison to Schumer, whose close ties to the financial sector date back to the late 1970s. Because a Senate seat is a six-year cycle, the totals regularly exceed House campaigns. Jeffries, however, appears likely to catch up to Schumer in his next few House reelection bids.

In his 2022 campaign, Schumer collected $41.1 million, despite running against an unknown opponent. Over 10% of his total haul came from Wall Street interests. The Blackstone Group kicked in nearly $275,000. Schumer also tallied six-figure donations from tech companies (including Google and Microsoft) and the private health-care industry.

In his most recent term, Schumer tackled left, sensing a groundswell of activist support for a potential challenge from Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez. The Senate majority leader’s outspoken support for the Biden administration’s student-loan reduction plan may make it seem like he is in sync with the activist base. Biden’s debt relief initiative, however, is a far cry from Bernie Sanders’ 2020 campaign proposal to fund free public college by taxing Wall Street stock, bonds and derivative trading.

Unlike Schumer, Jeffries at least claims to support Medicare for All. Although in 2019 the now-minority leader signed on as a cosponsor of single-payer legislation, Beltway insiders do not view Jeffries as a “major champion.” As The Intercept recently reported, the Brooklyn power broker is also not particularly interested in the Green New Deal.

Among other advantages, being the head of the minority party in either chamber allows leaders to defer action until they become majority leader. For at least the next two years, Jeffries will thus try to steer activists’ demands into the future. It is up to the base to decide how to apply pressure. In the meantime, Jeffries will be amassing a war chest that will make it very difficult for him to be dislodged.
ABUSE OF POWER
ASTORIA RESIDENTS DEMAND ROLL BACK OF CON ED’S NEW ROUND OF PROPOSED RATE HIKES

By Jenna Gaudino

Con Edison, the privately owned, publicly-regulated monopoly that provides electricity to New York City and Westchester County, is seeking permission to raise its rates by 11.2% for electricity and 18.2% for gas. If the increases are approved by the New York State Public Service Commission (PSC), the average residential customer’s electric bill would go up by about $21 per month, and their gas bill by $38, beginning in 2023.

The proposed increases would affect Con Ed’s approximately 3.3 million electricity customers and 1.1 million gas customers. The PSC grants increases after a period of public comment. It held three online public hearings in March, and has received more than 4,500 written comments.

The PSC and Gov. Kathy Hochul did not respond to a letter requesting another public hearing, sent in September by Assemblymember Zohran Mamdani (D-Queens), state Sen. Michael Gianaris (D-Queens) and more than a dozen other state legislators. The legislators assert that most New Yorkers don’t know about the potential rate hikes or how they’re determined.

Sparted by the lack of communication, Mamdani, with the assistance of Gianaris and others, hosted a “People’s Hearing” on the evening of Nov. 21, in Astoria, Queens. The hearing gave consumers the opportunity to express their hardships and frustrations, which were recorded and submitted as official public statements to the PSC and the governor.

“How dare Con Edison tell us that they will not talk to us about the rate increase of 10%?” Roseann McSorley, owner of the Katch Astoria gastropub, said at the hearing. “Who the hell do they think they are to hand us a bill for 10% more? This community has lost a third of our small businesses during COVID! A third! We’re all families trying to support our community. They come to our restaurants, our salons, our liquor stores. They enjoy the benefits of living in an Astoria that will not exist anymore. We cannot pay a 10% increase! We cannot!”

Con Ed argues that the increases are mostly due to increases in the market cost of fuel. “The supply cost has shot way up. It has to do with demand. It has to do with the supply,” Jamie McShane, the company’s director of media relations, said in a September press release. He said the war in Ukraine is pushing up oil prices as well, and “we buy it at the wholesale market, and we basically charge customers what we pay for it without a profit.”

The company also says that it will have to pay $2.5 billion in property taxes in 2023, and about $180 million of the increase in electric costs and $72 million of the increase for gas would go to cover that.

The rate increases will land on New Yorkers who are already having trouble paying their gas and electric bills. According to an analysis of data from January 2022 by The City, more than 400,000 residential Con Ed customers were 60 or more days behind on bill payments.

“I was getting off the bus and I saw this lady, this elderly woman, and she had two bags with her and she was struggling with them,” said Eric Thor, an Astoria resident, at the People’s Hearing. “I lifted up the bags and they were really, really heavy. It was all potatoes in there. So I walked with her to her apartment and I said, ‘Why didn’t you go to the grocery store that’s one block away?’ And she said, ‘The potatoes there are too expensive.’ So a 60 dollar raise would be debilitating.”

Sen. Gianaris argues that Con Ed could afford to lower rates even with the recent increases in the cost of fuel. It faces little competition, given its monopoly, and has $14 billion in annual revenues.

“We may defeat one rate hike, but then another will come in three years,” Assemblymember Mamdani said. “So what we are fighting for, through legislation, through organizing, is a different way of distributing energy. … That is something called public power. Con Ed is a private company and a private company will always want more profit. It’s our job, as the public, to ask, ‘Is this the only way we can do this?’ And we know that it’s not.”

The New York Power Authority (NYPA), run by the state, is one possible alternative. It currently finances construction of power projects through bond sales to private investors and repays bondholders with proceeds from their operations, without using any tax revenue or state debt. The power from those projects is delivered through a grid that Con Ed operates, however.

Public power could also help the state convert its energy system to renewable sources. More than 70% of the electricity NYPA produces is from hydropower.

The Build Public Renewables Act, introduced in the Legislature in 2021, would allow NYPA to build renewable energy projects itself and sell electricity directly to consumers. It would also require the NYPA to provide only renewable energy by 2030 and make it the sole power provider for state-owned and municipal properties by 2035.

The Senate passed it by a 38-25 vote last June, but it did not receive a committee hearing in the Assembly.

Con Ed boasts it has reduced carbon emissions from its facilities and operations by more than half since 2005, and pledges it will reach zero emissions by 2040.

However, the utility company does not actually own many of the plants that provide its electricity. State regulations in the late 1990s required the company to divest from its power plants in the city, such as the 2,480-megawatt Ravenswood complex in Queens that provides about one-fifth of the city’s electricity, mostly from burning natural gas.

The Ravenswood plants current owner is committed to making the transition to clean energy, its CEO told the Queens Post in February, but “it will take a lot of work over a number of years.”
‘YOU HAVE TO LIVE YOUR LIFE’
QUEER & TRANS NYCERS RESPOND TO COLORADO SPRINGS MASS SHOOTING

By Blake McMillan

In the wake of the Nov. 26 mass shooting at Club Q in Colorado Springs, The Independent spoke with people in the LGBTQ community at different locations throughout the West Village, predominantly “safe” queer spaces. They shared how they are processing their fears and what should be done to address the increasing hate and violence directed at queer people.

Light edits for length and clarity have been made.

KANGA ROO

Kanga Roo is a trans cocktail waitress at Playhouse in the West Village.

“It’s hard to navigate how you should feel about this because it’s really delicate. It’s been really tough. I mean, I definitely know the increase in security has been because the fear there. And I’ve just been managing that fear all these years.

“I just didn’t feel safe. A queer space that’s labeled a queer space, everyone can see that in the first place.

“I don’t feel more fearful than I did before. But the fear is at the forefront of my mind now. I think the Pulse nightclub shooting happened in 2016 in the summer, I think. And I first started coming to the center in October of 2016. I remember talking to my school social worker, who’s a trans man and just being like, ‘I’m scared to go,’ even though I’d always wanted to. Like, I was scared to come here; I just didn’t feel safe. A queer space that’s labeled a queer space, everyone can see that in the first place.

“I just wanted to be an open energy for people. They need somebody to talk to about any difficult situation, especially this. This has been a huge, catastrophic event that’s happened.

“If I’m going to go down in someplace, that sure as hell better be a place that has love in it. In some ways, you just kind of have to live your life as if it were going to be your last day, and it’s better to do it with the people that you love a lot. I love this place and I’m going to be here as much as I can.”

What do you think should happen in response to this anti-queer backlash?

“You have to live your life. You know, unfortunately, that’s really all you can do. There’s nothing that will make a person change more than just listening to understand.”

ASHER

Asher is a nonbinary person who has frequented the LGBTQ Center in the West Village since they were 16. The Indy encountered them seated at the entrance of the center.

“The people doing the stuff, when you look at them, are all white supremacists. As a Black person, these people are always kind of on my radar as dangerous people. As a queer person, I just always knew the hate and the capacity for this kind of violence existed.

“I’m 22. The Pulse nightclub shooting happened in 2016 in the summer. I think. And I first started coming to the center in October of 2016. I remember talking to my school social worker, who’s a trans man and just being like, ‘I’m scared to go,’ even though I’d always wanted to. Like, I was scared to come here; I just didn’t feel safe. A queer space that’s labeled a queer space, everyone can see that in the first place.

“I feel like the fear was always there, to be honest. I think right now it’s being amplified. It’s just a matter of taking precautions in different ways, like going to places with friends, making sure you’re not totally alone. So, in a way, you always feel like you have your queer family with you.

“In these spaces, you want to feel like you’re escaping from daily life where you don’t feel as loved or supported. These places are safe havens; I make people smile for my job as a drag queen. But I want to find a way to keep guns, but a lot of these shooters, they attain them legally.”

“I thought that I had gotten over that kind of paranoia until the Colorado Springs shooting happened. And I realized, I’m still scared. But I’m not reacting the same way because I’m able to sit in the space.

“I don’t feel more fearful than I did before. But the fear is at the forefront of my mind now. I think the Pulse nightclub shooter really was the one that put that fear there. And I’ve just been managing that fear all these years.

“I’m for gun control. But I think America is weird because the government and the politicians — it feels like they’re saying, ‘Let’s not offend like the Second Amendment people.’ I don’t understand why they hold so much loyalty to these old documents and shit like that. I don’t understand. If it’s an amendment, you can amend it. We can change it. People will still find a way to keep guns, but a lot of these shooters, they attain them legally.”

DEBBIE YORIZZO

Debbie Yorizzo is a lesbian who visits the LGBT Center. She works at a coffee shop and is applying to become a school teacher.

“It’s painful, and it’s based on people’s inability to see that diversity actually is powerful.

“I live in Staten Island and I’m an out lesbian. There are some pockets of progressive liberal people, but there’s also pockets of Republicans who are not willing to hear us, so I think it’s about our voices being heard.

“I don’t feel more fearful than I did before. But the fear is at the forefront of my mind now. I think the Pulse nightclub shooter really was the one that put that fear there. And I’ve just been managing that fear all these years.

“I’m for gun control. But I think America is weird because the government and the politicians — it feels like they’re saying, ‘Let’s not offend like the Second Amendment people.’ I don’t understand why they hold so much loyalty to these old documents and shit like that. I don’t understand. If it’s an amendment, you can amend it. We can change it. People will still find a way to keep guns, but a lot of these shooters, they attain them legally.”

What do you think should happen in response to this anti-queer backlash?

“What do you think should happen in response to this anti-queer backlash? Trying to listen to understand, instead of listening to respond. There’s a lot of response but it’s not the correct response, a lot of it coming from people who aren’t directly affected. You need to sit back and listen to what’s going on. You know, unfortunately, that’s really all you can do. There’s nothing that will make a person change more than just listening to understand.”
WHY THE HATERS HATE

THE ATTACKS WON'T STOP WITH LGBTQ PEOPLE

By Nicholas Powers

Was that music? The pop, pop, pop. Perplexed, partiers at Club Q turned and saw 22-year-old Andersson Lee Aldrich firing an AR-15-style rifle into the dancefloor. Panicked, they stampeded. Five were hit and killed. Twenty-five were injured.

Iraq War veteran Richard Ferrio and two others including a trans woman tackled Aldrich, grabbed the gun and beat the killer raw. They saved lives. Yet the truth is Aldrich is not the first, nor the last hetero-terrorist, in this case a straight man who claims to be nonbinary, using violence to terrorize LGBTQ people.

Increasingly, right-wing media portray them as a threat to kids. Using homophobic tropes of gays “grooming” youth in order to molest them, reactionaries channel populist anxiety over cultural change or economic inequality into sexual and gender fundamentalism. They have framed homophobia as perversion and promote patriarchy, mostly Christian nationalism, as the cure. The result is the normalization of violence that spills over into a wider swath of American life. Here is the bloodstream of hetero-terrorism.

LIFE ON THE EDGE

Every. Single. Day. Queer people are killed, beaten, fired, insulted, raped and threatened. Many victims don’t feel safe reporting crimes to the police. Will they be believed? Will they be laughed at or dismissed? A few do and those numbers, scanty and sporadic, paint a horrifying picture.

Death by machine gun under a strobe light is a dramatic display of homophobia. It is also the tip of an iceberg of violence. Jo Yurcaba reported in NBC News that, “... hate crime incidents based on anti-LGBTQ bias were down overall, from 1,393 in 2019 to 1,287 in 2020,” but that attacks on trans and non-conforming people “jumped by nearly 20% for the second year in a row.” The Human Rights Campaign took the grim toll of 57 trans men and women, killed in 2021. Before that, the National Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs tallied roughly 2,000 hate crimes a year against LGBTQ people in the United States alone from 2011 to 2013. It’s about five attacks a day. The hardest hit were people of color, transgender women and, tragically, the point where targets of hate overlap, transgenders of color, who were killed most and often brutally.

Add to that many gay, transgender and gender nonbinary people don’t report violence. Experience taught them they will not be helped or believed. Or if they “come out” to report a crime, it can cost them their job and housing, due to a lack of legal protection against anti-LGBTQ discrimination in many states. The statistical portrait of homophobic violence is incomplete, with as many as twice the number of victims, if not more, staying silent. So while the FBI reports roughly 7,500 hate crimes annually, the U.S. Census conducts a National Crime Victimization Survey and pegs that number at roughly 200,000 hate crimes in the U.S. annually.

Added to the physical violence the LGBTQQ community faces are new laws pushed by Republicans to re-closet them. Since 2018, conservative state legislators across the country have filed at least 670 anti-LGBTQ bills, 238 just in 2022. In an NBC News report, Matt Lavietes and Elliot Ramos wrote the measures, “would restrict LGBTQ issues in school curriculums, permit religious exemptions to discriminate against LGBTQ people and limit trans people’s ability to play sports, use bathrooms that correspond with their gender identity and receive gender-affirming health care.” Knowing laws are turned against them like knives causes higher rates of depression and suicide among trans youth.

Pull the lens back and one sees not just in Red-State America but whole swathes of the world in which LGBTQQ are in danger. In Saudi Arabia, homosexuality is punishable by death. In Iran, homosexuality is punishable by death. In Zimbabwe, the president has publicly threatened to behead gays. In Russia, anti-LGBTQ laws are written and violence stoked by politicians.

PEDOPHILE PARANOIA

How is this justified? How is the immense violence poured upon a sexual minority excused in the eyes of their murderers? When they look in the mirror, they don’t see killers but heroes who are defending the even more helpless — children.

The most damaging homophobic stereotype is that LGBTQ people “groom” children in order to turn them gay or trick them. It serves a specific role in the conservative worldview. It inverts their position as members of the dominant racial group, the dominant gender, the dominant class whose privileged position was built on centuries of violence. In short, history’s villain is transformed into its hero because now they rescue babies. The psychological need to be innocent killers is so great that QAnon followers hallucinate that the Democratic Party is a Satan-worshipping cabal, selling children for sex. It led one man to storm a pizzeria in Washington, D.C., to free kids being trafficked there. He found nothing but four years in prison.

The right-wing accusation that Democrats and LGBTQ people are pedophiles has gone from the fringe to mainstream. At first it was QAnon followers. Next, Republican senators used it to question Judge Ketanji Brown Jackson during her Supreme Court nomination hearings on why she was “lenient” on pedophiles. Jonathant Chait wrote in New York Magazine that Republican obsession with alleged Democratic pedophilia “says nothing about the parties’ comparative permissiveness about sexual assault. It reveals the existence within one of them of an openness to conspiracy theories and a network of operatives unprincipled enough to exploit it.” It also reveals the fragile insecurity at the heart of modern conservatism that instead of facing reality, they retreat into a paranoid fantasy in which they are the “good guys with guns.”

After Aldrich stormed Club Q and fired an assault rifle into the crowd, killing, injuring and terrifying the people in it, conservatives again justified it as a retaliation for grooming kids. Three examples come to mind. Tucker Carlson at first condemned the shooting but then showed a graphic that said, “STOP SEXUALIZING KIDS.” On a subsequent show, his guest threatened more mass killings, “until we end this evil agenda that is attacking children.” Far-right pundit Tim Poole tweeted, “Club Q had a grooming event. How do we prevent the violence and stop the grooming?” Matt Walsh, a YouTube Tuber with almost two million followers said, “Is that hard to not cross-front of kids? Is the compulsion that overwhelming?” he asked in the video. “If it’s causing this much chaos and violence, why do you insist on continuing to do it?”

Take a wild guess what happened. In December, 50 far-right protesters, some armed with guns, showed up at a Holi-Drag Storytime in Ohio, which was then canceled. Armed rightwing bullies have intimidated drag “Raise” is Actually a Pay Cut for JFK8 Workers.

Managers had said that a union meeting panicked after Amazon suspended around 80 out of 6,500 employees that took part in a wildcat sit-in in response to an Oct. 3 warehouse fire. Mendoza said, “We don’t say ‘This is definitely going to happen,’ we just tell them factual information about what’s legal and what’s not legal, and in what ways we can fight back.”

EXTRA! EXTRA! READ ALL ABOUT IT!
AMAZON LABOR UNION NEWSPAPER REVIVES INDEPENDENT LABOR PRESS

By Katie Pruden

Surviving JFK8” screams one headline, in bold black letters. Other, smaller ones read, “Bezos Cuts 10K Jobs to Send Bae to Space?” and “Attention: General Membership Meeting 12/9.” On Page 2, the Editorial Board authors “Can’t Survive on $18.75? Why Amazon’s ‘Raise’ is Actually a Pay Cut for JFK8 Workers.”

Witty and to-the-point. This is The Associate, the official newspaper of the independent, worker-led Amazon Labor Union (ALU) at the JFK8 warehouse in Staten Island, the only U.S. Amazon warehouse where workers have won union representation.

ALU members Cassio Mendoza, Ebrima Baldeh and Brima Sylla started publishing the newspaper in July. Previously, ALU workers-organizers circulated union information by posting flyers in break rooms, but felt the need to discuss worker-related issues more in-depth, more permanently — to deliver something people could pick up at work and take home.

“JFK8 is like a rumor mill,” Mendoza, co-editor of The Associate, says of the mega warehouse where more than 6,000 people are employed. Mendoza says rumors are often started by management, like a broken game of telephone. Cre-ating a newspaper was a way to counter that.

“Whenever something good happens to the union, you’ll hear whispers about some crazy shit, and then you have to do dispel it,” Mendoza said. He recalled that workers came to a union meeting panicked after Amazon suspended around 80 out of 6,500 employees that took part in a wildcat sit-in in response to an Oct. 3 warehouse fire. Managers had said that if any of them were involved in writing Issue 1.

The Associate is published bi-monthly with a press run of 4,000. It is printed by TriStar Offset Printing, a unionized print shop in Queens, and dropped off in bound stacks of 100 at the ALU headquarters near JFK8 in northeastern Staten Island.

Over the course of a week, editors and other ALU distribute the newspapers at the bus stop in front of JFK8, at the entrance to the warehouse, in the breakroom and within their respective departments in non-work areas. There is a network of people who distribute the copies in most shifts and departments, and the ALU hopes to soon ensure the entire facility is covered.

The paper is print only — there is no online version. Delivering the news in print invites readers to carefully peruse it, the editors say, and builds trust and credibility: The distribution process gives union members a chance to interact with co-workers they haven’t met before.

“I see people pick up the newspaper and read it,” co-editor Ebrima Baldeh told The Independent. “They are going to spread the word that the articles are interesting. It’s not about gossip, it’s about what is happening in the building,” he said.

Workers write articles that include a mix of political education, union information, broader labor movement news and news from within JFK8. The ALU funds the paper but its editorial board operates independently from the union’s executive board.

In addition to informing workers about what’s going on in the warehouse, the newspaper is aimed at bolstering support for the union and connection between union and non-union members — it is an organizing tool.

Although JFK8 workers voted to be represented by the ALU, that is not the last step in the process of official unionization. The ALU won’t be certified (meaning it won’t represent all workers in the warehouse, collect dues or hold a union election) until a first contract is negotiated between the union and the employer. This process is arduous and lengthy, particularly when dealing with an employer as powerful and staunchly anti-union as Amazon.

“The slow pace of the certification process is frustrating,” said Baldeh. “Changes are not sudden and the transition is not something that can take place immediately, so, the newspaper has been spreading the word for us.”

Continued on page 16
The constant thefts of their electric bikes have led New York City’s food delivery workers to organize themselves over the past two years, using Facebook and WhatsApp to create a citywide support network and community watch group. Their community activism is partially based on traditional Indigenous Mexican forms of organization.

On a cold, rainy November night on Manhattan’s Upper West Side, Juan Solano rides his electric bicycle through the city streets. Soaking wet with water in his boots, he still manages to keep a smile on his face as he battles the natural elements. He knows by heart the addresses of all the buildings in the neighborhood, some of the largest of which have separate entrances for workers. He’s one of the approximately 60,000 food delivery workers who keep New York City afloat, working for apps like Grubhub, Doordash and Relay.

Juan has been a delivery worker for the past four years, since arriving in the United States from his hometown, San Juan Puerto Montaña, in Guerrero, Mexico. Since then he’s seen his fair share of incidents, including two traffic accidents and a robbery last year.

According to The New York Times, electric bicycle thefts increased 98% between 2019 and 2020. The bikes, which delivery workers depend on, cost around $2,000 apiece, and are frequently sold on the black market.

The NYPD says they don’t have data for the number of robberies this year, but a Facebook page, El Diario de los Delivery Boys en la Gran Manzana, created by Juan and his cousins Sergio and Cesar Solano, has documented at least 70 bike thefts in the past three months.

“When the pandemic started, people started robbing us with guns, with knives, or three people would take your bike,” recalls Antony Chavez, another delivery worker.

The distances they needed to travel also became much longer, increasing the number of traffic accidents. The application Relay in particular, which Juan uses, is one of the few that pays an hourly wage of $12.50 — but in exchange, riders have to accept all the orders that come in, even if it’s just a single slice of pizza delivered 50 blocks away.

And if there’s an accident, “When you fall with a bicycle ... and you need to go to an ambulance, who will take care of your bicycle?” asked Juan. “The ambulance doesn’t take the bike.”

Juan and his cousins started their page in November 2020 to share information with their community. At that time, Juan remembers, delivery workers were barely organized, and most thefts occurred with impunity. Now, two years later, the page has more than 43,000 followers and conditions have improved, even as robberies continue on a daily basis.

“They’ve now created a mutual support network using seven WhatsApp groups,” explains Ambar Reyes, a researcher at MIT who has been studying the Delivery Boys. They use different means to catch thieves, such as installing hidden GPS devices on bikes or physically going to the location where the robbery occurred within minutes of it happening.

“We get at least three cases a day,” said Juan. In fact, during the Delivery Boys’ own anniversary celebration, there was an accident just a few blocks away at 110th Street and First Avenue. “In five minutes, about 20 colleagues were gathered,” Juan said proudly. “We were able to help faster than the police.”

In particular, Juan says robberies used to occur daily along the Willis Avenue Bridge between the South Bronx and East Harlem. He and his cousins don’t frequently cross it, since they live in East Harlem and most of their work is in Manhattan, but when they heard complaints from several of their compañeros, they knew it was time to organize.

“Starting in June 2021, they launched a community watch group,” says Juan. “We have urged everyone to cross in groups so as not to be assaulted, because the people who take our bicycles if they see you alone, they’ll take [your bike], but if they see that there are five or six of you, they do nothing, because even they are afraid of us.”

Despite holding protests and making demands to install security cameras and put more lighting on the bridge, they never received a clear response from the police.

In the absence of police support, “we help ourselves,” Juan explains. “The people save the people.”

At the entrance to the bridge at 125th St. and First Ave., a rotating group would stand guard from 8 p.m. until the early hours of the morning. If someone was robbed, they would immediately go to the middle of the bridge to help them.

Juan and his cousins come from the Tlapaneca Indigenous community, isolated from the mainstream culture in Mexico. Spanish is actually Juan’s second language.

Their “forms of social organization in New York and in Mexico, are born from the same reason; which is a lack of help from the government when they need help,” according to Reyes.

In addition to community watch groups, which are common in Guerrero and other states in Mexico, the Delivery Boys use Facebook live broadcasts as if it were a community radio station, a form of communication also common in Mexican rural and Indigenous communities, says Reyes.

The on-site watch ended about eight months ago when they saw the robberies decrease, but the space under the bridge remains a place of unity between the two counties for them, that’s where they celebrated their anniversary, with a birthday cake, mariachi music and the raffle of a new electric bicycle.

The Delivery Boys, along with other groups, make up the NYC Food Delivery Movement.

Self-sustaining and without ties to NGOs or local politicians, “we are not an organization, we are just a movement and what we do is move around the city,” explains Sergio Solano.

Conditions remain difficult. Founder of another Facebook page El Chapín en Dos Ruedas Antony Chavez, originally from Guatemala, lives in the Bronx but keeps his bike in a Manhattan parking lot for safety.

Rolando Reras, with four years delivering, now uses a shared bike from the city instead of his own; he’s already had his own stolen and “I’m afraid it will be stolen again,” he explains.

And many delivery workers have lost their lives. On Nov. 2, during Day of the Dead celebrations, the Delivery Boys created a traditional ofrenda under the Willis Avenue Bridge commemorating the (at least) 18 delivery boys who died during the past year.

One of them is Tiburcio Castillo, who died after being assaulted crossing the same bridge in June of this year.

Still, the workers are proud that in recent months they have been able to recover more of the stolen bicycles, thanks to the GPSs with which they can locate them.

“Right now I have about 10 GPSes to give away to my followers, to encourage them” to use them, said Chavez.

In fact, just last month the Delivery Boys recovered a stolen bike.

“Even though the compañeros gave it up for lost, today thanks to [the GPS] it appeared in Manhattan,” the page reads.

“[After an intense search the compañeros from the WhatsApp group were able to recover it.”
A 9 a.m. on a dreary November morning, a line of customers stretched outside the door of the Starbucks in the base of the Port Authority Bus Terminal. A young woman working at the front of the crowd, those who ordered online must queue to the left. frosty, morning sunlight falling on the Times Square area, a sign for a coffee chain’s order-ahead feature with e-commerce firm’s Just Walk Up Kiosks filled in, but their continuous presence over nine hours drew the attention of the partners [Starbucks workers] it makes no sense to the customer — you eat today? And they go, ‘No, I used my markouts so I don’t need you. It sounds confusing because it is confusing. It makes no sense to speak to a customer. Workers also complained that the presence of the Amazon at the company beginning in late 2021: Erratic schedules, sporadic union-busting and capitalist nonsense coming together.” “It’s two of the biggest corporate entities known for Amazon Go store as well,” worker-organizer Greyson Lee told workers to wear their SBWU shirts that day, in response to a crackling radio, “We aren’t going to let them have our undivided attention. "The biggest portion of stress comes from the fact that we’re an Amazon employee," says Battjes. "The only time I see a customer at the store and simultaneously increase benefits for people all over the world, then, I can go to sleep at night," Bates said. They and many of their coworkers are young adults struggling to live on their own. Bates, Lee, Aaron, another member of the organizing committee. "There are positions that were specifically designed for these Amazon Go-Starbucks combos: Internet support, food prep, concepts," she said. More than 265 Starbucks have voted to unionize with the work- er-led Starbucks Workers Union (SBWU) since December 2021, and at least 48 other stores are currently preparing for union elections. At Amazon, where the workforces are much larger and management equally anti-union, only one shop has voted for a union for the JFK8 warehouse on Staten Island, where workers voted 2,654 to 1,311 for the independent, worker-formed Amazon Labor Union (ALU) in April. Organizing efforts have been launched in at least ten other states. The Indy reported in July. “Most of a different Starbucks built in an identical con- text,” the store’s opening announcement read. The baristas that staff the location bag in dollars. They began organizing a cam- pagn for representation by the Starbucks Workers Union in the new store.

The Starbucks-Amazon Go stores feel like an afterthought in a dystopian world created by Amazon founder Jeff Bezos and Steele. "50% of the coffee chain’s workers are now represented by the Starbucks Workers Union," worker-organizer Greyson Lee told The Indy. “It sounds confusing because it is confusing. It makes no sense to us, customers, that we’re an Amazon employee," says Battjes. "The only time I see a customer at the store and simultaneously increase benefits for people all over the world, then, I can go to sleep at night," Bates said. They and many of their coworkers are young adults struggling to live on their own. Bates, Lee, Aaron, another member of the organizing committee. "There are positions that were specifically designed for these Amazon Go-Starbucks combos: Internet support, food prep, concepts," she said. More than 265 Starbucks have voted to unionize with the worker-led Starbucks Workers Union (SBWU) since December 2021, and at least 48 other stores are currently preparing for union elections. At Amazon, where the workforces are much larger and management equally anti-union, only one shop has voted for a union for the JFK8 warehouse on Staten Island, where workers voted 2,654 to 1,311 for the independent, worker-formed Amazon Labor Union (ALU) in April. Organizing efforts have been launched in at least ten other states. The Indy reported in July. “Most of a different Starbucks built in an identical context,” the store’s opening announcement read. The baristas that staff the location bag in dollars. They began organizing a campaign for representation by the Starbucks Workers Union in the new store.

THEY'RE FRUSTRATED BUSTING GIANTS IN THEIR FIGHT FOR BETTER PAY, WORKING CONDITIONS

The Starbucks-Amazon Go workers feel like an afterthought in a dystopian world created by Amazon founder Jeff Bezos and Steele. “50% of the coffee chain’s workers are now represented by the Starbucks Workers Union,” worker-organizer Greyson Lee told The Indy. “It sounds confusing because it is confusing. It makes no sense to us, customers, that we’re an Amazon employee," says Battjes. "The only time I see a customer at the store and simultaneously increase benefits for people all over the world, then, I can go to sleep at night," Bates said. They and many of their coworkers are young adults struggling to live on their own. Bates, Lee, Aaron, another member of the organizing committee. "There are positions that were specifically designed for these Amazon Go-Starbucks combos: Internet support, food prep, concepts," she said. More than 265 Starbucks have voted to unionize with the worker-led Starbucks Workers Union (SBWU) since December 2021, and at least 48 other stores are currently preparing for union elections. At Amazon, where the workforces are much larger and management equally anti-union, only one shop has voted for a union for the JFK8 warehouse on Staten Island, where workers voted 2,654 to 1,311 for the independent, worker-formed Amazon Labor Union (ALU) in April. Organizing efforts have been launched in at least ten other states.

THEY'RE FRUSTRATED BUSTING GIANTS IN THEIR FIGHT FOR BETTER PAY, WORKING CONDITIONS

The Starbucks-Amazon Go workers feel like an afterthought in a dystopian world created by Amazon founder Jeff Bezos and Steele. “50% of the coffee chain’s workers are now represented by the Starbucks Workers Union,” worker-organizer Greyson Lee told The Indy. “It sounds confusing because it is confusing. It makes no sense to us, customers, that we’re an Amazon employee," says Battjes. "The only time I see a customer at the store and simultaneously increase benefits for people all over the world, then, I can go to sleep at night," Bates said. They and many of their coworkers are young adults struggling to live on their own. Bates, Lee, Aaron, another member of the organizing committee. "There are positions that were specifically designed for these Amazon Go-Starbucks combos: Internet support, food prep, concepts," she said. More than 265 Starbucks have voted to unionize with the worker-led Starbucks Workers Union (SBWU) since December 2021, and at least 48 other stores are currently preparing for union elections. At Amazon, where the workforces are much larger and management equally anti-union, only one shop has voted for a union for the JFK8 warehouse on Staten Island, where workers voted 2,654 to 1,311 for the independent, worker-formed Amazon Labor Union (ALU) in April. Organizing efforts have been launched in at least ten other states.
A state appeals court on Nov. 22 unanimously upheld a March lower-court ruling that the City can’t legally switch retired workers from traditional Medicare to a private Medicare Advantage plan or force them to pay more to stay on Medicare. It agreed that the switch violated Section 12-126 of the city administrative code, which requires the City to “pay the entire cost of health insurance coverage” for workers and retirees up to the legal limit. However, the Adams administration and several major unions, including District Council 37 and the United Federation of Teachers, are campaigning to change that section. They say the switch is necessary to achieve the $600 million in health-care savings they agreed to in 2018. “There are better ways to save money on health care” than “throwing taxpayers’ money down the corrupt Medicare Advantage rabbit hole,” Stuart Eber, president of the Council of Municipal Retiree Organizations of New York City, said after the decision.

NLRB SUES GREAT NECK STARBUCKS

The National Labor Relations Board’s Brooklyn regional office filed suit against Starbucks in federal court Nov. 30, requesting that the court order the company to bargain with the Starbucks Workers United union at its Great Neck store and rehire a fired worker. The union filed for representation at the Long Island store in February, submitting cards signed by 15 workers, but lost the election by a 6-5 vote in May. The NLRB said there was credible evidence that the store and district managers had threatened that workers would lose benefits if they voted for the union, interrogated them about union activities and fired one union supporter in retaliation. The suit argues that those violations were “serious and substantial” that there was a minimal chance the board could conduct a fair rerun election. It is the fifth injunction the NLRB has sought against Starbucks since the organizing campaign began last year.

ON THE STORY: The Indy’s October cover story looked at the city’s controversial plan to shift 250,000 municipal retirees to privately-run Medicare Advantage.

STATE COURT RULES IN FAVOR OF NYC MUNICIPAL RETIREES

A state appeals court on Nov. 22 unanimously upheld a March lower-court ruling that the City can’t legally switch retired workers from traditional Medicare to a private Medicare Advantage plan or force them to pay more to stay on Medicare. It agreed that the switch violated Section 12-126 of the city administrative code, which requires the City to “pay the entire cost of health insurance coverage” for workers and retirees up to the legal limit. However, the Adams administration and several major unions, including District Council 37 and the United Federation of Teachers, are campaigning to change that section. They say the switch is necessary to achieve the $600 million in health-care savings they agreed to in 2018. “There are better ways to save money on health care” than “throwing taxpayers’ money down the corrupt Medicare Advantage rabbit hole,” Stuart Eber, president of the Council of Municipal Retiree Organizations of New York City, said after the decision.

NLRB SUES GREAT NECK STARBUCKS

The National Labor Relations Board’s Brooklyn regional office filed suit against Starbucks in federal court Nov. 30, requesting that the court order the company to bargain with the Starbucks Workers United union at its Great Neck store and rehire a fired worker. The union filed for representation at the Long Island store in February, submitting cards signed by 15 workers, but lost the election by a 6-5 vote in May. The NLRB said there was credible evidence that the store and district managers had threatened that workers would lose benefits if they voted for the union, interrogated them about union activities and fired one union supporter in retaliation. The suit argues that those violations were “serious and substantial” that there was a minimal chance the board could conduct a fair rerun election. It is the fifth injunction the NLRB has sought against Starbucks since the organizing campaign began last year.

A state appeals court on Nov. 22 unanimously upheld a March lower-court ruling that the City can’t legally switch retired workers from traditional Medicare to a private Medicare Advantage plan or force them to pay more to stay on Medicare. It agreed that the switch violated Section 12-126 of the city administrative code, which requires the City to “pay the entire cost of health insurance coverage” for workers and retirees up to the legal limit. However, the Adams administration and several major unions, including District Council 37 and the United Federation of Teachers, are campaigning to change that section. They say the switch is necessary to achieve the $600 million in health-care savings they agreed to in 2018. “There are better ways to save money on health care” than “throwing taxpayers’ money down the corrupt Medicare Advantage rabbit hole,” Stuart Eber, president of the Council of Municipal Retiree Organizations of New York City, said after the decision.
AUTOMATION NATION

ARTIFICIAL INTELLIGENCE WILL REMAKE THE ECONOMY OVER THE NEXT DECADE. WHO WILL REAP THE BENEFITS?

By Amba Gueguerian

Jobs automation will sweep through the economy at an unprecedented pace in the coming decade.

Will this surge in automation cast tens of millions of fired workers into a newly impoverished underclass? Can enough new jobs be created so we at least muddle through?

Will strong insurgent unions ensure that the economic benefits of increased productivity are broadly shared? Or, to push the envelope even farther, what if the means of production were put under public control and the economy was organized around meeting human needs?

The extent to which we as workers organize ourselves to defend our rights will go a long way in shaping that future.

A 2019 Brookings Institute report projected that 52 million U.S. jobs would be affected by algorithms by 2030. In 2021, global consulting firm McKinsey & Company predicted that 45 million jobs will be lost to algorithms and androids by 2030.

A 2022 analysis by Finance Online reports that 43% of employers are set on cutting down their workforces to make way for advanced technology. The group says that U.S. workers between the ages of 18 to 34 are the most affected by job displacement from automation, that by the late 2020s, nearly 25% of women workers are at risk of being displaced compared to more than 15% of men and that highly-educated people have more opportunities to work in sectors where they are less likely to be displaced due to technology integration.

We’ve already seen automation firsthand. Think self-checkout at the grocery store or McDonalds, or being forced to interact with automated customer-service phone lines and chatbots. Workers at Amazon, Tesla and other Big Tech companies have experienced “cobots” — large robots that work “with” them to get the job done. This often leads to additional work stress, from the knowledge that more technology at the workplace means worker surveillance — the “digital whip” — to the fact that robots are often not programmed to properly understand the pace of the human they’re working with and break frequently, leading to unsafe working conditions in the name of “productivity.”

Consider this testimony from Thomnetta Robin-son, a worker at an Amazon warehouse in Stone Mountain, Georgia:

“You want us to perform our job with ineffective, inadequate equipment. People are hurt. I got pictures of piss in bottles and cups. … You gotta tape up your monitor that literally just hangs there, is barely lit up. The scanner, God, Lord, you’re playing with that all day. The belt is always breaking. Mind you, you have to pack a box in 37 seconds, which is just unrealistic. All the training they tell you to do, they don’t tell the computer that. So the computer doesn’t know you gotta do all these little steps. If you’re missing an item, you need to go look for it. You gotta get all the way down on your knees. And there are techniques and protocols that they add. … You add on this extra shit but you still gotta do it in 37 seconds. … You can’t be safe and productive. It ain’t gonna happen. … You have to stock your station; there’s not enough water spiders. But the computer doesn’t know you have to get your own stuff. They just know that you have to pack your box in 37 seconds.

Automation is a recurring feature of capitalism as bosses seek to exponentially increase productivity while reduc- ing the percentage of their revenues they pay out as wages. At the same time, new industries and new jobs are created and unemployment rates remain relatively stable over time, though the process of change can be wrenching for some communities.

With the development of Artificial Intelligence (AI) — computer systems that are able to perform tasks that normally require human intelligence — technology-induced mass unemployment is more likely than in the past. AI technology is being developed to drive cars, clean schools, perform surgery, write articles, compose songs, create digital art and beyond. Some (very rich) people are using AI to digitally preserve their consciousness so that replicas of themselves can be created in the future, perhaps when humans have migrated to other planets.

Studies suggest that workers who have specialized training or post-high-school education and those that are younger are most likely to find new work once displaced by AI; others fall into poverty. Job automation has already added to labor-market inequality since at least the 1980s.

This brings to mind dark, Ready Player One-esque images of unemployed masses living in giant, walled-off ghettos. Or, a utopian alternative: A world in which people spend less time working grueling, menial jobs and more time on fulfilling work and leisure, and in which all of our basic needs are met. (In both worlds, AI out-snarls its programmers, gaining some level of sentience and could, in theory, organize against the boss.)

Harry Holzer, an economics professor at Georgetown University who studies the subject, projects that a greater dependence on AI will occur but that the shift will be gradual. As companies transition to using more robot technology, new jobs will be created to respond to a rising demand from consumers who can now afford cheaper products (prices will drop due to employers’ lower production costs).

“The people hurt are not just the people directly displaced by the technology. It’s also the people who in some sense have to compete with the technology or with globalization,” Holzer told The Independent. “There are ways in which people can adjust. When technology is implemented, it does some of the tasks that workers have done, not necessarily all the tasks. Now, workers who only did one task on the job — you know, on an assembly line, they tighten some bolts as the car is passing — robots are gonna replace them. But if they have multiple tasks, and the automation does some but not all, there’s a judgment call on the employer’s part: Should he hold on to that worker and train them to do a new task?”

It is unlikely that new jobs will be created at the same rate that old ones are lost, or that enough new jobs will ever be created. And no matter what happens, massive layoffs will occur.

“Going forward, what makes all this more uncertain is that AI seems to have a much wider range of capabilities, even if it doesn’t exist today,” says Holzer.
ISH ALONGSIDE THE LABOR MOVEMENTS

According to the Labor Press Project at the University of Washington, “between 1880-1940, thousands of labor and radical publications circulated, constituting a golden age for working-class newspapers.” These papers existed in the many languages spoken by immigrant workers.

During the Red Scare of the late 1940s and early 1950s, the labor press was attacked. “There were literally laws passed that prohibited the publications of those entities deemed subversive or radical,” Gilpin said.

This caused a major decline in the radical labor press. Then, as union membership shrank from the 1970s onward, union newspapers became less common while major commercial newspapers dropped their labor beat reporters even as their pages swelled with business coverage. Many left publications, including The Independent, continued to carry the torch for labor coverage in the 2000s and 2010s. The Indypendent has been a leader in covering labor issues in the 2000s and 2010s. In the past several years, major news outlets slowly have gravitated back to doing more union coverage amid the labor turmoil sparked by the pandemic. But, there’s still a large void to fill.

“People don’t really understand the value of the union if they don’t understand what is possible and what other workers have done in other places to secure much better working conditions and pay,” Mendoza said. “Political education is a way of opening people’s eyes to what is possible, so that they’ll feel more of a commitment to help build the union.”

Cassio Mendoza says the commercial media’s coverage of the ALU has failed to grasp the conditions workers face how unions work. “There’s certain things you wouldn’t know to report about unless you worked in the building,” he said.

The writers at The Associate, full-time workers at JFK8, hope to articulate what’s happening within the warehouse and the ALU in a way that attracts workers who are not currently union members.

In a report “Missed Opportunities: LGTBQ Youth Homelessness”, from the University of Chicago, we see a nightmare America, where among the 4.2 million youth that go in and out of homelessness in a year, roughly 400,000 are LGTBQ. They run from home because of school bullying whether online or in real life. They run from homophobic parents, especially if they are Black, especially if they are Latino and poor. They climb into the back seats of cars and trade sex for food. They sleep in abandoned buildings. They use drugs to numb pain and wake up trying to wash off the handprints. They make families in the street to replace the ones they fled, and it sometimes works, briefly, like a miracle.

The real threat to American children is Conservative straight people. They are chasing after the destroyers of children. If they look in the mirror, they’ll find them.
FIGHTING THE MAN AT 30,000 FEET, & WINNING

The Great Stewardess Rebellion: How Women Launched a Workplace Revolution at 30,000 Feet
by Nell McShane Wulfhart
Doubleday, 2022

By Jessica Max Stein

It wouldn’t be much of an exaggeration to say that in the 1960s, the airplane cabin was the most sexist workplace in America,” declares Nell McShane Wulfhart in The Great Stewardess Rebellion: How Women Launched a Workplace Revolution at 30,000 Feet. Nor does this seem like much of an exaggeration, given the grim picture Wulfhart initially paints. Stewardesses were fired upon marriage, pregnancy, or when reaching a certain age (32 on some airlines, 35 on others). These restrictions limited their tenure, making it nearly impossible to organize. Yet organize they did, in tandem with civil-rights laws and the women’s movement, changing their working conditions almost unimaginably. Their story is a delightful underdog saga and a vivid snapshot of the heyday of flying, in the era before deregulation.

Wulfhart tells this story largely through two flight attendants and organizers: Patricia “Patt” Gibbs and Tommie Hutto. She refers to the women by their first names throughout, a little chummy.

Gibbs joins American Airlines in 1962 at age 20, her story illustrating the decade’s circumstances and changes. Indicative of the job’s strict appearance standards, Gibbs is required to close the gap between her front teeth. This agonizing dental procedure has one silver lining: It helps her adhere to the airline’s stringent weight standards (which, notably, did not apply to male stewards). “Her mouth was unbecoming to an American Airlines stewardess,” she says.

Still, if anything, the productivity of SFWR highlights the uselessness of the TWU. The American Airlines stewardesses move to form their own union, the Association of Professional Flight Attendants (APFA). Wulfhart dramatizes this a little cornily: Gibbs sneaking off to LA for a “secret meeting,” the women frantically trying to get everyone to sign authorization-to-act cards that will trigger a vote to form the union, breathlessly counting up the votes and, predictably, forming the APFA.

The narrative pits Gibbs and Hutto against each other. Gibbs wants to start a new union and Hutto, by now president of a TWU-affiliated union local, wants to work within the system. Wulfhart contrasts their different styles, exaggerating the characterizations for dramatic effect. Gibbs is the brazen, combative lesbian; Tommie, the more diplomatic married chick. Yet once the APFA is formed, Patt becomes the new president, and Tommie becomes the vice president, the two women often working together to negotiate arbitration, vosing nothing but mutual respect. The reader is left to wonder why the story pitted its two main characters against each other.

The book could also do a better job with minorities within this minority. There’s a short section on stewardesses of color (3% of all stewardesses in 1972), but then it returns to the all-white narrative. And while the book follows Gibbs’ journey out of the closet, it doesn’t particularly apply this to her experiences as a flight attendant and organizer. Though flight attendants could be fired for being gay, the book only mentions this in the context of the gay male flight attendant.

The APFA serves the women powerfully for just a few years before deregulation pummels the industry. Lots of airlines fold, many flight attendants lose their jobs and those that remain struggle to hold on to benefits and protections. Some weight rules are relaxed in the early 1990s, but the issue is never quite resolved despite being emphasized throughout the book.

Still, the women wrought many changes. What’s more, they set a precedent of activism that influenced later generations of flight attendants such as Sara Nelson, the International President of the Association of Flight Attendants-CWA, which represents nearly 50,000 flight attendants at 19 airlines. Indeed, the book ends with her words when she called for a general strike during the government shutdown of 2019: “Strike, strike, strike, strike, strike,” she said. “Say it — it feels good.”

THE INDYPENDENT
REMEMBERING THE SIXTIES GENERATION
A SON EXPLORES THE MEANING OF HIS MOTHER’S LIFE

By Nicholas Powers

My mother died a year ago. I flew to Florida to see my aunt and hear stories I wasn’t told but wanted to know. We stood at the photo wall; I touched the images like puzzle pieces that if connected properly could give me the meaning of her life. Here is a brown girl with moody eyes. Here, she sports an afro, proud and defiant.

Going from photo to photo, I could see her transformation. She was born in 1948, in a Puerto Rican Brooklyn enclave and turned 20 in 1968, the peak of anti-Vietnam War protests, the hippie movement, the Young Lords and Black Panther rebellions. All the marches and slogans scooped my protests, the hippie movement, the Young Lords and Black Panthers.

My mother searched for in the ‘60s was herself. She could not find a reflection at home. Grandma saw a girl “too dark” to be her daughter. Grandpa didn’t see her when she grabbed my hand and spun me salsa-style.

“I was dating a black guy from the West Village; very hip, wore a cowboy hat, had his own jeep.” She drummed her fingers on the steering wheel. “He drove us to Woodstock and as you probably read, the roads were jammed, so we walked to the event, got separated in the crowd. For the next three days, strangers befriended me — me — this petite Puerto Rican woman. They fed me, let me sleep in their houses. I was a child of the streets.”

“Did I tell you, the next day she was happy as a baby, like it was her birthday. God, I wanted that, too. Pinky swear?”

“You went to Woodstock?” I asked my mother during one of our long car rides in upstate New York.

“Oh yeah,” she nodded. “If I tell you, don’t judge me. We had these traditional dances. Boys in suits. Girls in dresses,” she said. “I hung in the West Village with the bohemians. I’d be at a cafe and see Allen Ginsberg write poems and perform them. She theatrically fluffed her hair. “I came back to the dance in jeans and an afro. All my friends came up and gawked, asked what the hell did I do.” She laughed. “In a month, they were all dressed the same way.”

“We were serious, too,” she nodded. “We started a storefront housing-rights workshop to help tenants against landlords. Marched all over the city. But you know, it got a little too serious. I held a rent party, everything groovy, everyone dancing and drinking and in comes a nationalist who bombed a bar filled with Wall Street types. Can I tell you, it’s like the needle scratched on the record and time froze. Suddenly, everyone remembered they had kids and had to go home. He left too. But it was a wake-up call.”

On the flight to New York, I scrolled through photos and saw my mother holding me as a baby. Maybe it was being on a plane, but I remembered when I played, I climbed her feet and she pushed me up. “Fly,” she said, “Be free!” And I spread my arms in a crazy, jerky way to keep balance before falling on the bed. We laughed so loud.

By the time she gave birth to me, 1968 was in the rearview mirror. Mom took the experience of free love and broke with how kids were raised in our family. In her day, children were “seen, not heard.” Very old school. But she poured love into me like a cup filling over. We chased each other with water guns around the living room. She sang and danced. After work, we slept in front of the TV as the national anthem played; the screen became a small static snowstorm in a dark apartment. She talked to me. She listened. Her arms wrapped me like an inner tube. We were best friends.

Long before I learned about the ’60s, I felt it in her shameless joy. In the photo, she held me like a favorite album, proud and giddy. And I saw on my toddler face that glow.

“I LOVE YOUR SON more than you do.” She pointed her finger like a knife.

“Yes, that’s what I told him,” she said. “His boy has difficulties, probably on the spectrum and the father calls him dumb and a waste of time.” Her eyes squinted. “The thing is he’s smart, he just takes information in differently. If the dad gave him half a chance.”

Mom was re-enacting the parent-teacher conference where a man insulted his kid, one she taught and consulted his kid, one she taught and

When the Covid lockdowns were lifted, she came to visit her grandson but couldn’t make it up the stairs. Huffing and barely balancing on a cane, she called for him. I ran down, annoyed that she strained herself. “Mom,” I said, “Mom, c’mon.” I got her back into her car and brought my son to play with her. I went to the bodega, came back and she sang Beatles songs to him.

Four a.m., the hospital called. “She passed out during dialysis,” the doctor said. “She choked on her saliva for 10 minutes. She’s in a coma. She may be brain dead. Do you want us to revive her?”

“YES!” I screamed at them. I screamed while driving across the Verrazzano Bridge. I screamed into my hands when I saw her, a breathing tube taped to her mouth. I drove to the beach at high tide and screamed her name.

In New York, walking past the rubble of the Twin Towers, reading how the president vowed revenge, I realized I did not just hear my mother’s stories, I was reliving them. She had gone to Borough Manhattan Community College. I taught there. She once had an afro. Now, I had dreadlocks.

When the U.S. military was preparing to rain bombs on Iraq, each one a mini 9/11, each one a new crime to avenge this crime.

“Be careful Nicky,” she patted my shoulder. “I know you’re going to protest. They’re better at surveillance now. And don’t assume everyone is a friend. They hire people of color to infiltrate leftist groups. That’s how they got us.”

I nodded absentmindedly and ran into the street, then turned back. She could not come. We walked and talked together for so many years. I didn’t notice that she had slowed down until just then, when she looked at me with a mix of pride and fear.

Rivers of people carrying signs flowed into New York. Whatever one’s ideology, we knew the pain and loss of 9/11 would stay with us forever and did not want anyone else to suffer what we suffered. And the U.S. military was preparing to rain bombs on Iraq, each one a mini 9/11, each one a new crime to avenge this crime.

In the last seconds of her life, I held her hand as the nurse removed the breathing tube. The heart monitor beeped frantically as the heart rate plummeted. She turned it off, which was kindness. I cradled my mother’s head, kissed her face. She turned to me, wrenching a last second of awareness to see me. “Love. Love. Love,” I sang to her.

PARTMENT OF TRUTH

•   •   •

AND FLUNG HER INTO AMERICA.

 ALL THE MARCHES AND SLOGANS, SCOOPED MY MOTHER LIKE A GIANT WAVE AND LIFTED HER OUT OF THE NEIGHBORHOOD, OUT OF THE FAMILY AND FLUNG HER INTO AMERICA.
WHILE MY QATAR GENTLY WEEPS

BY STEVEN WISHNIA

Qatar is far from the worst government ever to host a World Cup. Yes, the oil-rich Persian Gulf state has abysmal labor conditions and harshly homophobic laws. More than two-thirds of the country’s 2.9 million residents are migrant workers, mostly from South Asia. An investigation by the British Guardian newspaper in 2021, probably the most in-depth done so far, estimated that more than 6,500 migrant workers from India, Pakistan, Nepal, Bangladesh and Sri Lanka had died in Qatar since 2010, when it was awarded the 2022 Cup.

The investigation was only able to link 37 deaths directly to construction of the seven new stadiums, but said that many fatal accidents were misclassified as “non-work related,” and other deaths came from laboring in the extreme heat, lack of medical care or dangerous housing conditions.

Qatar abolished the “kafala” system, which locked migrant workers into indentured servitude (they could be deported if they didn’t have a job, and employers could hold their passports) in 2020, but some of its practices continue; the revised law does not cover domestic workers. The new minimum wage, set in 2021, is about US$275 a month, with an allowance of about $220 for food and housing. The country’s per-capita gross domestic product is above $61,000, the highest in the world.

But is Qatar worse than Vladimir Putin’s Russia, the billionaire-oligarchy dictatorship that hosted the 2018 Cup? It hasn’t invaded any adjacent countries, bombed hospitals or massacred villagers. The Qatari government persuaded FIFA, the Federation of International Football Associations, to threaten to give yellow cards to players who wore rainbow armbands, but the Putin regime’s religious-nationalist hatred of gays and lesbians is as bad or worse. (That the sports world is acting on this is progress, given male jock culture’s traditional homophobia — Major League Baseball teams holding “Pride Night” celebrations and built stadiums that featured giant busts of dictator Benito Mussolini. The final, which Italy won, was held at the National Fascist Party Stadium in Rome. Within two years, the regime would invade Ethiopia; within a decade, it would help the Nazis ship thousands of Italian Jews to Auschwitz.

The worst venue for a World Cup-related game, however, was in November 1973, for a playoff between Chile and the Soviet Union for a spot in the 1974 Cup: the National Stadium in Santiago. Chile’s new military dictatorship had just washed the bloodstains from the ground’s most recent use as a concentration camp for more than 6,000 people seized after Pinochet’s coup that September. The Soviets refused to play in a “place of tortures and executions,” so the Chilean team took the field unopposed, kicked the ball into an empty net, and were declared victors.

FIFA’s inspectors a few weeks before had noted that there were no “detainees” on the pitch or in the stands, and that the grass was “in perfect condition.”

Several other countries could have suited FIFA’s intent to hold the World Cup in North Africa or the Middle East. Egypt has the most solid professional league in Africa and one of the world’s best players in Mohammed Salah. Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia also have long-established leagues and qualified for the Cup several times.

Saudi Arabia or Iran would have been politically problematic, but they too have Cup history and strong fan cultures. Qatar, although its national team won the Asian championship in 2019, had to import Lebanese fans to cosplay enthusiastic supporters.

There have been numerous reports that Qatar bribed its way into getting the Cup. They might well be true, as FIFA has a long history of corruption, but another reason was just the ordinary power of money. Qatar was rich enough to build infrastructure that would appeal to the plutocrats in the luxury boxes, glitz like a Swarovski-crystal sculpture of a giant soccer ball. Those people would likely not enjoy experiencing Moroccan culture by riding in a crammed Mercedes Grand Taxi.

Morocco wound up being the Cup’s surprise success, becoming the first team ever from Africa or the Muslim world to reach the semifinals. With only a few players from the world’s top clubs, it relied on teamwork, a stout defense, adapt use of space and goalkeeper Yassine “Bono” Boukhtouhy’s penalty-saving acumen. It upset Belgium, Spain and Portugal without conceding a goal before going out to defending champions France, 2-0.

Palestine didn’t qualify for this year’s World Cup, but its presence was felt in the world’s most-watched sporting event. Fans who traveled to Qatar, the first Middle Eastern or African country to host the 32-team tournament, wore Palestinian keffiyeh headresses; broke into performances of the dabke, a traditional Palestinian dance; and chanted “Free Palestine!” at matches and in the streets.

Flag-waving and chants interrupted a number of matches at the 48th minute in remembrance of 1948 Nakba (or “catastrophe”), in which the founding of the state of Israel was accompanied by an ethnic cleansing campaign by Zionist paramilitaries that drove two-thirds of the Palestinian population off their historic lands.

“Free Palestine” posters were unfurled in the stands. When a Tunisian fan ran onto the field during the second half of a game between Tunisia and France, which Tunisia won, supporters chanted “Palestine, Palestine!” as the man was dragged away.

After Morocco upset Spain to reach the quarterfinals, the Moroccan team huddled around a Palestinian flag. Speaking to the Middle East Eye, Tareq Sawalmeh, a Palestinian-Moroccan teacher whose father grew up in a teacher whose father grew up in a Palestinian village, said “Moroccans have made us Palestinians nothing but proud during the World Cup.”

— AMBA GUERGUERIAN
#FREEPALESTINE
Friends, I don’t have my regular advice column to share with you this month. We are mourning two friends of mine who passed days apart, John Sims and Hamish Kilgour. John Sims had a vision for the American South. Every one of his projects exploded the way things were. He took the sentimental anthem “I Wish I Was In Dixie Hooray Hooray” and brought it to a dozen different musical traditions, folk, blues, rock, gospel, calypso… The singers (of many races and backgrounds) sometimes were mocking at first, but then many rose to a complicated acceptance of the song while replacing its history with sorrow, anger and energy. The project is a master-stroke, ultimate critique combined with forgiveness. “I wish I was in the land of cotton…”

And then my Brooklyn neighbor Hamish Kilgour died. It feels like he is still walking, as he often did, up the road in front of our home into the cars coming one-way toward him. Hamish’s radical vision was to be thoroughly himself in a completely predictable monoculture of early-80’s rock.

Hamish and his brother David formed the New Zealand indie band “The Clean” and became a major influence from their indie-rock community at Flying Nun records. The Clean were punks with a reputation that went around the world without marketing, while Van Halen, Kansas, etc. floated through the culture like corporate aircraft carriers.

Their music was self-made with real-life stories, subtle as it was bombastic, and driven by Hamish’s fierce drums. In the way of the punk revolution, they had an everyday appearance and the authority that comes from knowing who you are. For political anti-consumerists trying to break the trance of corporate culture, the punks were a key guide.

Each of my two friends leaves us freedoms that started out as their personal battles. John and Hamish had a brazenness in the face of big, old institutions. The Neo-confederacy and late power rock were both stagnant at this point, each of them macho and corrupt. But as we have seen, such money-driven boredom can help an original person focus on the mysterious things, which is the beginning of justice.

John and Hamish both got handed deaths at a young age. Their communicating to revolutionaries was sudden and fleeting. How do we sort out the teachers of original life from the thousands of celebrities, “the human products,” unasked for models raining down on our heads? The heroes in media stories are such a constant barrage that we have to disengage from totalitarian consumerism as a conscious martial art and go to the likes of John Sims and Hamish Kilgour as a focused act of independence.

Then we have to create rituals of remembrance, to help each other keep the love and work real. They are gone now, and we face a thousand prefab memory events like Columbus Day, Thanksgiving and the St Patrick’s Day Parade — often based on falsified histories. St. Christopher, St. Patrick and Thanksgiving (or is it Thankstaking?) only offer colonizing violence to celebrate — defeating the ocean, defeating the snakes, the mythologized beginnings of a centuries-long war to seize control of a continent. John and Hamish didn’t control others with queens or gods — they invented a personal form of entertainment, generous to their audience, a kind of conversation.

And they were cultivators of friends. And we friends got the funky stuff too, the murmurs and rumors and sighs, their self-doubt. But that hemming and hawing was their compost of wild thoughts that they built into something radical.

And now they are dead and the whispers and sighs that friends allow one another, those little sounds that friends’ share — gone. Just a 500-mile dark silent wind is there now. John and Hamish are telling us to feel the sorrow, go through the whole thing and lift the memory; we have free-use of their courage.

The two are spirits among us, as the preacher said. We will walk into our activism guided by these friends.

— REV BILLY
WHY I GIVE TO THE INDY

Editor’s Note: Jerry Meyer was a longtime supporter of The Indypendent before his death in November 2021. In this 2019 essay, he explained why he was such a staunch supporter of the Indy and why giving money to support left projects like this one was a source of so much joy to him — and why it should be for others as well. For more on Gerald Meyer, see bit.ly/3FFK4wJ.

By Jerry Meyer

I marvel at how The Indy is reaching into New York City’s communities with an invaluable message: We must defend the gains we make and regain losses we experience.

I cheer every time I see how the newspaper’s articles and features reach out beyond the confines of the already convinced. It demonstrates that change is not an all-or-nothing, now-or-never thing.

I learn what younger (much younger) New Yorkers, living in communities not reported about in The New York Times, are doing to change the status quo.

I value The Indy’s Events Calendar, which informs its readers of expanding networks of progressive cultural and educational activities and provides the basis for genuine progressive communities.

I appreciate the high artistic level of The Indy’s illustrative layout and background. Each issue of the paper is saying, “art matters.”

I hope that The Indy’s increased circulation will continue so that its hopeful and thoughtful message will reach ever more progressive people in need of a beacon.

I worry that The Indy might stagger and even fall due to a lack of support from its appreciative readers.

The left must be self-funding. We must all take responsibility for nurturing and growing its institutions, which are essential to our struggle for a fairer, more humane world. And it can be a source of great joy to do so.

I believe that others will join me in giving, in whatever amounts possible, to secure and strengthen The Indypendent: A free paper for free people.

Gerald Meyer (1940–2021) was a founding member of the Hostos Community College faculty, co-chair of the Vito Marcantonio Forum and author of Vito Marcantonio: Radical Politician (1902-1954) and other writings. He was a lifelong activist.

TUESDAYS 5–6PM WBAI-99.5 FM WBAI.ORG

THE INDIYPENDENT NEWS HOUR

TUNE IN & TURN ON NEWS, INTERVIEWS & MORE!
THE INDYPENDENT is an absolutely unique voice in New York City — providing bold, original reporting and analysis of struggles for justice here and beyond.

In 2022, we continued publishing our print edition while expanding our online presence and hosted a weekly, one-hour prime-time radio show on WBAI. We look forward to continuing to do more great work in 2023. But, we need the support of our readers more than ever.

We took a beating during the worst of the pandemic but powered through, confident in the belief that our best work was still ahead of us. Now, with your help, we can provide more incisive coverage of more movements, print and distribute more papers, build a more dynamic online presence, and train more up-and-coming progressive journalists.

To keep THE INDY going strong, we need to raise $50,000 during our annual winter fund drive. If we don’t reach our goal, we could falter just as a new year begins.

PLEASE GIVE TODAY.

Whether you can give $27, $50, $100, $500, $1,000 or more, it all helps.

IN SOLIDARITY,

THE INDYPENDENT TEAM

TO MAKE A GIFT GO TO INDYPENDENT.ORG/DONATE OR USE OUR QR CODE!
Give the gift that keeps giving... in the fight against racism and sexism, capitalism and war!

Get 40% off all INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS titles until January 1st. Only at intpubnyc.com.

Use coupon code Holiday2022 when you checkout.